About ten thousand years ago, around forty per cent of the land surface of Earth was covered by forests. Today, thanks to the power of chain saws and bulldozers, about half of these forests have vanished.

Very few forests remain which are still ecologically intact. It is difficult to measure the extent of the harm that deforestation is causing to our planet because forests are so central to life on Earth and, hence, impact it in so many ways. For example, they stabilise climate, foster and maintain bio-diversity and prevent flooding and soil erosion.

The effects of logging operations on a forest can be devastating. As soon as trees are lost, erosion begins. Next, hunters and miners move in as the land becomes more accessible and then farming takes over as the last trees are cleared away. Once farming establishes itself, there is little hope for reforestation.

16. What is the author's purpose?

- A) To warn readers of a dangerous situation
- B) To release new scientific research
- C) To sell forests to developers
- D) To hold a controversial position

17. Why are the effects of logging difficult to measure?

- A) Forests are so vast.
- B) They appear late.
- C) They are so widespread.
- D) The hope of reforestation remains.

18. What often happens after forests are removed?

- A) They are re-forested and re-cut.
- B) They stabilise the climate, foster biodiversity and stop flooding.
- C) They are cleared by loggers and exploited by others.
- D) They are cut down and die.

Hi Jane,

I hope you're keeping well.

I'm organising Alison's birthday party and was hoping you could help. As you know, she's going to be 17 next month and I want it to be a big surprise for her. I've already spoken to her family and they've agreed to keep it a secret.

First of all, we need to find a venue. We'll probably be inviting around 100 people, so we'll need quite a big venue. Also, I think a place with a garden would be ideal. Then we need to organise the food. She loves Indian food, so I thought we could find an Indian catering company to cook for us. Last of all, is the entertainment. For this, I thought we could hire a DJ to come and play music. Of course, these are just my ideas and you probably have better suggestions. Can you help with any of this? Let me know.

Take care,

Michelle

Hi Charlie,

How are you? I hope you're keeping well.

I'm doing OK. My exams are over and I think I did quite well, actually. I'm still nervous, though. The results come out in a few weeks. The only thing is my health seems to be getting worse. I've got pains in my legs and feel tired all the time. Hopefully, it's nothing serious.

The state of Nevada plans to build a nuclear waste disposal site in the Nevada desert. However, the proposal is being challenged from all sides. Economist Alison Spears thinks the site is unnecessary: "With the advances in recycling and new compacting technologies, our other waste sites are not even in full use." Spears argues that existing sites should be developed before new ones are built. Furthermore, environmentalists are asking for all waste sites to be tested for leaks and for other safety tests to be carried out. Developers in the Nevada desert are also resisting the plans for the site. Most builders in the area would prefer to have the land developed for homes.

28. What is the subject of this article?

- A) Opposition to a planned nuclear waste disposal site
- B) Growth in the Nevada desert
- C) Environmental effects of nuclear waste disposal sites
- D) Advances in recycling and compacting technologies

29. What do developers envision for the land?

- A) Nuclear development
- B) Environmental development
- C) Test development
- D) Residential development

30. Why does Alison Spears think this site is unnecessary?

- A) There are already too many waste sites in Nevada.
- B) The existing waste sites are not being used to their capacity.
- C) It will be an economic burden on the State of Nevada.
- D) Now that people recycle, Nevada doesn't need waste sites.
