A school bus driver pulled into a hamburger restaurant because he wanted to eat. Instead of turning off the engine and taking the key with him, the driver left the bus running. "It was cold outside, and I didn't want the kids to get cold while I was buying food," he told a police officer. There were 30 children on the bus but the driver forgot to set the emergency brake because he was in a hurry, he said. The bus began rolling away from the restaurant. As it got faster, the children began screaming. Twelve-year-old Harry ran forward to the driver's seat and grabbed the steering wheel. He put his foot hard on the brake pedal and managed to stop the bus as it approached a fence. After the police arrived at the place, they thanked Harry for his brave action. However, he replied that stopping the bus was easy compared to doing his English homework.

The last time I went to India in 2010, I was reminded there is always something to do or to see that you probably have never done or seen before. There are amazing experiences to have — whether fascinating or shocking or rewarding or confusing or educational or frustrating — all day long, no matter where you happen to be. When I traveled to India for the first time back in 2001, just my first two weeks in the country involved camping at a pristine lake in a remote tribal region, hiking in the Himalayas, visiting Tibetan villages and monasteries, drinking mango lassis for the first time from a market stall in Kolkata, playing cricket with a group of Indians I met at a Hindu temple, and spending an evening with the family of a taxi driver who invited me to his home for dinner.

25) When did the author of this blog first visit India?

26) What game did the author play on his first trip?

27) What did the taxi driver do to the author?
